Clinico-pathological findings of drug-induced reactive arteriopathy. Cases of drug-induced reactive arteriopathy were investigated by light- and electron microscopy. In the patients with drug-induced arteritis, some disorders were observed in small arteries on gross and microscopic examinations. The following findings were most characteristic: (1) Each episode of the drug-induced vasculitis occurred without any particular precipitating factor. (2) The inflammatory reaction was followed by thrombotic change. The thrombotic changes were considered to be a reactive hyperplasia of the vascular wall by the local formation of fibrous tissue at the site of arterial wall damage. On electron microscopy, mild proliferation of ground substance around the widened basement membrane, proliferation of vascular smooth muscle cells, and similar changes were observed in the thickened arterial wall. These pathological changes were considered to be the results of damage to vascular walls. A possible pathogenesis of drug-induced reactive arteriopathy in this report is discussed. Expression of metallopeptidase inhibitors in pancreatic beta-cell transplants into streptozotocin-diabetic rats. Sustained hypoglycemia was induced in streptozotocin (STZ)-diabetic rats by transplantation of dispersed rat pancreatic islets into the renal capsule. The transplanted islets were analyzed for the expression of secreted inhibitory peptides 1, 4, 10, and 13 and the related Zn²⁺-binding metallopeptidase inhibitors TIMP-1, TIMP-2, TIMP-3, and TIMP-4. In addition, the amount of specific cellular inhibitors of metallopeptidase activities, reisletin and reisterin, was quantitated in the transplanted islets. Inhibition of metallopeptidase activities, as detected by a sensitive assay using the synthetic chromogenic peptide, S-2266, was observed in transplants both 2 and 12 wk after transplantation. The expression of TIMP-1, -2, and -3, but not TIMP-4, occurred preferentially in the cortical region of the transplants. The amount of TIMPs in the transplants was estimated to be approximately a 1000-fold higher than the inhibitory activity observed. TIMPs were not expressed in native islets or in the sera of normal or diabetic rats. Reisletin was not detected in

The Daily Mail called him "the criminal Jean Valjean" - wrong again. The singer/actor's puffy, distinctive face and mop of black hair makes him look like a sort of 1950s Bonnie Tyler, one of those 1950s women in slacks who'd wear a cardigan from their husband's shop, and in 1953, he played a shifty pastry-shop owner who's looking to dump the loot he's stolen in a film called Ladies in Love, with Jane Wyatt. But when he joined the Royal Shakespeare Company, it was as Shakespeare's rhinoceros, Sir Ocular and Abjuror Q, a ramrod-straight member of the royal household who harrumphs through the soliloquies, demanding: "Why all this noise in the night?" Adam Stempel, also known as Herr Stempel, says, "It's a very alternative-looking role." At the time of his appearance in Queer As Folk, his name was Adam Stempel. He'd changed it because he'd realised something. He says: "In German you have knigge and in French you have chevalier. The title of the British knigge is Herr, and in German the title is Herr. So at first I thought this is a nice way to say Herr Stempel. But it's not actually British and it sounds more German than English." Advertisement - Continue Reading Below He changed it to "Herr Stempel", in English, to protect himself, but not to avoid being pigeon-holed. He's been in lots of other high-profile British roles as well, including the elder brother of Dame Maggie Smith's character, in Park Chan-wook's Oldboy, and the department store owner, Josie A. Poppy, in the film adaptation of Frederick Forsyth's Killing Time. In the latter part of the film, he imagines himself to be the private detective assigned to the film's star, John Hurt, who plays a killer dressed as a priest. Stempel must have been really hurt to read about himself in the press as a criminal. He denies it. He says he's been in lots of films, and Herr Stempel has appeared in plenty of legitimate films, as well as in The Simpsons and The Simpsons Movie. But for people who know the theater and his work there, they'll recognise that face. It
