I don't think a lot of people anticipated that this series would be so popular. Unfortunately, I think it will be retired in Season 8 because they are probably getting ready to film the last three seasons of the show. Also, they are going to skip right past the WWI tournament. So when Season 8 starts, we'll find out who was eliminated from the show after the spring board. On another note, I've been thinking about this series a lot lately. One thing I've been thinking about is the Evolution of the Tournament format. I find myself wondering how can these tournaments stay fresh when there are so many game series out there (Killer Instinct, Tekken, Smash Bros., Devil May Cry, Dark Souls, etc.). When I say "Evolution of the Tournament Format" what I'm referring to is the idea that some games have risen through the ranks of popular competitive games to become tournament staples. I think that only Street Fighter can truly be called a tournament staple. It's the original fighting game. It's got a long history. It's also one of the oldest fighting games still in existence. When Street Fighter first came out, it was only really made for fighting game amateurs. It was kind of a rough experience. Nothing compared to the other fighting games like Mortal Kombat or Super Smash Bros. It wasn't until the original Street Fighter 2 came out that fighting game amateurs and pros could compete. This was a big shift in competitive gaming because not only could amateurs compete with pros, but it forced the best pros to become more skillful and make changes in their personal games to become more polished. It also forced top pros to have to rely on tournament wins and lose as a last resort in the game. That's why the majority of tournament players are very paranoid right now. They don't want to lose to a lag-boxed scrub that plays one game at a time. There have been a couple sets of tournaments where the winner wasn't even the person with the most points or records or wins. They may have been the person that spent the least amount of time to learn the game or to adapt to changing playstyles 648931e174
